Q: How to have two React-Redux components on the same page? I am trying to render two components on a single page. They are meant to be on the same page in the same order, but they go in the opposite order in the DOM because of this. I have a component called filters and another component called search and both of them are passed to the same component called AppComponent. AppComponent should render filters + search. But due to the issue above filters loads first and then the search component loads. I have tried to change the order by placing the search component first in the render() function and also by using the orderByChild() method. However, even when I do these steps, they still have the same issue.

AppComponent: class AppComponent extends Component { render() { return ( Test ) } }
CardList: class CardList extends Component { render() { return ( Test ) } }
AppModule: class AppModule extends Module { getDefaultProps() { return { filters: [], search: {}, }; } getInitialState() { return { filters: [], }; }

Malala's Story Malala "The first thing I remember is her face. I see her face every time I am in a kitchen, a classroom, a bathroom or a clinic. I see her little face on a bank note, on a stamp and even on the currency of some countries. She represents power of education, of peaceful co-existence and of change. She has given her life in the pursuit of her dreams and aspirations. I do not know her personally, but I know that, being an educationist, having been inspired by her and getting my education from her, her fight has given me strength and courage to continue my own struggle for the education of women."Russian president Vladimir Putin has refused to rule out future military action in Syria, as foreign ministers from eight world powers met with Washington for a third day of crisis talks on forming a peace settlement to end a conflict that has descended into civil war. Moscow is opposing proposals for a transitional government in Syria while also insisting it has no forces in the country. Diplomats have been meeting in Geneva to find a resolution to the country's five-year conflict, having failed to agree on whether to include President Bashar al-Assad as part of a political transition for Syria. Russia and China have been blocking moves at the UN security council that would have seen sanctions imposed on Syrian officials. Negotiations have dragged on for almost two weeks. The main sticking point has been Russia's opposition to the participation of the al-Assad government in any peace talks. Putin is determined to preserve Russian military presence in Syria – the only one of a dozen or so foreign contingents on the ground in the conflict that has so far killed around 70,000 people and displaced close to two million from their homes. "I didn't rule out any option, including military, which would be compatible with the interests of both the Syrian people and the international community," Putin said on Wednesday, adding: "We are ready to continue these negotiations on any conditions. We are not the initiator, we are not the reason for the present negotiations, they are being pursued by the US and by Saudi Arabia. You know, in the Middle East it's always the Americans who are the initiators." A new round of talks has commenced in Geneva as the European Union and the Arab League met for crisis talks on the Syria crisis. White House spokeswoman Bernadette Meehan said she did not have any new details
