If the links in the post work, then it is working, regardless of whether the second links also work. The goal of the project is to develop fundamental data on the fine structure of the mouse lens and its protein constituents. The plan is to use a combination of physiological, biochemical and electron microscopical methods to dissect lens ultrastructure into its component parts. The optic portion of the lens is the principle site of protein synthesis in the adult organism. The enzymatic activities of the soluble proteins synthesized in the lens will be measured and compared with the distribution of the same proteins using gel electrophoresis and peptide mapping. The high concentrations of proteins and associated enzymes will be determined by measuring the activity of known enzyme fractions of the soluble protein extract. The structural state of the insoluble proteins, which is not related to enzymatic activity, will be studied by measuring the salt- and thermal-induced denaturation of purified crystallins using fluorescence and circular dichroism. Biochemical and physiological methods will be used to localize enzymes

The developers of PhotoScore & NotateMe have done a great job. The paid versions are not too expensive and there are a lot of improvements compared to the free version. Write a review The application is easy to use. PhotoScore is particularly helpful to people like me. I am a photographer and graphic artist, and often I have a large amount of work to do during the day and no time to spend hours trying to find the right template for the job. With

PhotoScore, I can quickly print a template, then I can use it to produce several works in a shorter time. To be completely honest, this is my only complaint; in fact, I would have no reason to criticize this program, if it weren't for one thing: PhotoScore Free does not include text recognition, whereas the paid version does
