Blood Trail Written by Cameron Doucette (1920-1995) and directed by Robert M. Young (b. 1931) The titles read, "A Multicolored Story of Blue and Yellow Harmonies", "Set in American History", and "The Saga of an Ancient Race", respectively. Many of these summaries and titles refer to the central plot of this production, the blood feud between one homestead's two tanned cowboys (Ben Bluemooney and Philip Fonneware). These devices imply, conversely, that the American West is portrayed as a place of bravery, blood, and danger - much as the western vistas are portrayed in the conventions of both art and popular culture. The stage is set for these conflicting ideals. The still-living hero of the story, Bluemooney, is almost the sole ennobler of the story, the man with no view beyond caring for others. Among his virtues are integrity, and sex appeal. Even his critics, Bluefoo and Redspot, seem aptations of the traditional Indian stereotypes: Bluefoo as a cunning warrior and Redspot as a jeering part-savage. The other characters, especially Philip Fonneware, aspire primarily to a safe and productive life. One of the significant elements in the story is the determination on the part of the principal actors to achieve a sense of authenticity in the production. These efforts are an interesting combination of what is, and what should be. One of the main roles played by Bluemooney, for example, he and Philip face off for about fifty minutes, exchanging cuts and thrusts for each other's bladed steeds. A lengthy skill match, with the actors alternately performing and assessing each other's thrusts and feints. The emphasis throughout the performance is with the Americans, not the Indians. These two men are played as both two-dimensional and three dimensional images. They have existed, in a manner of speaking, before the writing of the story. They are "real" actors, with traits that describe their characters in their sources - their histories. There is the depth and fervor of commitment to projecting these two main characters which is the substance of this production. The women are basically there, in a silken twist of appearance and form, to be raped, preserved, or abused. If they are ever there, they are in the one case essentially
