This is merely the latest example of how international organizations take tax havens at their word, even when they are lying. It also exposes the hypocrisy and political bias that invariably accompanies the pressure placed on countries to cut back on their use of tax havens. Even before a large part of the documents leaked from HSBC has been confirmed, the European Commission has been arguing that countries need to reduce the amount of tax they pay on their profits made from the use of offshore financial centers. To do this, it would threaten to sanction countries that allow companies to use tax havens and claim they will give them the benefit of the doubt if they end their practices. In this way it follows the path of the global financial sector, which is now regulated in a similar manner. The documents reveal the bank, one of the world's largest and most profitable institutions, had the audacity to tell the Swiss government in May 2012, eight months before Swiss justice opened its investigation into the bank
