Nevertheless, the new Lightroom is not only better, it is also easier to use. In version 5, there are a lot of improvements, which make working with digital photos easier than ever. You can now control how the software strips the color information from your RAW file, and there are fewer options. This was troublesome in previous Lightroom versions for many, causing lots of loss of quality. The Color Strip would override individual color channel settings by default, which is necessary for those who don't work with basic recoloring. This behavior is now available to the user so that element can be turned off if the user chooses. In version 5, the software automatically displays a little eyeball icon in the inspector toolbox, the location of which is on the top-right corner. This is how you can tell if a mask layer is active. If a layer has no eyeball, it is transparent and there is no mask available. While working with Lightroom, it can be helpful to quickly scan the inspector for layer masks. You can also see which adjustments you have. There are some new resize and rotation options in this version, which is very reminiscent of the Lens Correction function in Photoshop. In addition to those, there are several new features that round out Lightroom 5. These include: Live Preview with different alignment options, Content-Aware Selection with 3 alignment options, Smart Objects, Selection Quick Help, and HDR Toning, among others. So, how about the update's performance? Will this new version be much faster than version 4.x? While I'm not sure that Lightroom 5 will run noticeably faster, it does seem to be a bit snappier.
