Changes in liver lactic acid concentrations are related to dose and outcome in patients undergoing major open abdominal surgery for cancer. Intraoperative acidosis is associated with increased cellular metabolism and decreased cell death. This study examines whether hepatic lactic acid concentration (LA) is related to dose of aprotinin and/or outcome in patients receiving this drug during major open abdominal surgery for cancer. Hepatic LA was measured after closure of the abdomen and before second-look laparotomy (SLL) in 123 patients. Aprotinin was given at doses of 0.02, 0.05, 0.08, and 0.15 mg/kg/min, starting 15 min before SLL in 57 patients. LA concentration was significantly higher after SLL in patients receiving aprotinin when compared to matched controls. The highest dose of aprotinin was associated with the highest LA concentration and worse outcome. These findings are suggestive of a relationship between LA and tumor progression in the absence of aprotinin.

The CCA regulates cytosolic Ca^{2+} oscillations by the luminal Ca^{2+} -ATPase. Changes in intracellular calcium concentration are important signal transducers in many mammalian tissues. They can propagate from extracellular stimuli through the plasma membrane to elicit important cellular responses, including excitation-contraction coupling (ECC) in skeletal and cardiac muscle. The mechanism of propagating changes in cytosolic calcium is not well understood. Here we show that the cytoplasmic calcium-ATPase (CCA) in rat intestinal smooth muscle is capable of regulating the cytosolic free calcium concentration. The CCA activity is present in both jejunum and ileum, and in the intestinal smooth muscle myocyte line CRL 1642, it is distributed across the cytoplasm in approximately three domains. The CCA acts as the regulatory site in cytosolic Ca^{2+} oscillations. The fast component of oscillations in cytos
