targets of vaccinia virus infection. The thymus is the primary site of T cell development and function. It contains numerous specialized non-lymphoid cells, such as thymic epithelial cells (TECs), that play critical roles in T cell development. We have identified vaccinia virus as a potent in vivo infection of murine thymus. By day 5 post infection, vaccinia virus-derived replicating intermediates, (progeny of the original infecting virus) were present in all the thymic compartments. The infected cells were often surrounded by apoptotic cells and some infected cells were undergoing apoptosis. The infected cells were predominantly CD11c(+) CD8(-) CD4(-). In a parallel study, using an EGFP-expressing reporter virus, we have demonstrated that the virus specifically infects CD11c(+) CD8(-) CD4(-) cells in the thymus. The infected cells expressed high levels of CD80 and MHC class I. The CD80 was predominantly expressed on the cell surface, while CD86 was enriched in the intracellular compartments. The expression of the costimulatory molecules in infected thymic cells was associated with the expression of co-stimulatory molecules including CD40, CD86 and CD80. MHC class II was not expressed on infected thymic cells. The results presented here strongly suggest that thymic dendritic cells (DC) are the prime targets of in vivo infection by vaccinia virus and the infected thymic DC are the primary source of antigen presenting cells in the thymus.
